Search for Baseball Czar Marked by Confusion

Reports on the search for a baseball commissioner make it clear the club owners not only haven't found a man to take the place of Judge Landis, but can't agree on what kind of man they want, or what they expect him to do for them when they find him.

Undeniably, some of them want no more than a figurehead and will do their best to make sure whoever gets the job will be sharply curbed as to power and influence. Others think a policeman, on the Landis type, but without quite the breadth of authority the Judge held, is needed. Only Larry MacPhail and Horace Stoneham seem to think that part of the duty of the new commissioner should be that of trying to rebuild the waning enthusiasm for the game in the high schools and the colleges and even they can't agree as to how that should be worked out.

Strangely enough, both Larry and Horace will discover, on discussing the matter of promotion with their colleagues, that some of them think too much money already has been spent in that direction and are in favor of slashing the budgets for the leagues' publicity bureaus.

This attitude may be incomprehensible in view of the great inroads made by football and other sports-but particularly footballon the old popularity of baseball, but it exists, nevertheless. Larry and Horace will learn soon enough that their first battle will be fought right in the council rooms of the major circuits and they'd better begin getting ready for it now.

Diamond Game Needs Spokesman in Washington

The eagerness of Stoneham and Branch Rickey to force the appointment of a commissioner as soon as possible is based, of course, on a desire to get a spokesman for the game in Washington as soon as possible to plead its cause against a still uncertain measure of hostility. Other emissaries of the game have tried to get a definite expression on what the Government wants done, but have come off with little more than half threats, half promises and, in some instances, outright evasion of the question they have asked.

Secretary of the Navy Forrestal is the only one in Washington who-and unsolicited, at that-has stood up and declared himself. In his order to his subordinates on the matter of discharges of prominent athletes from the Navy, the Secretary said bluntly that sports were, "unessential to the national health, safety and interest." Naturally, the club owners couldn't wring very much comfort out of that, but at least they know where Forrestal stands.

"I wish some of the others down there would be equally frank." one baseball man said last night. "All we want to know is which way we're headed—to a full season or to no season at all. What we're afraid of is that we simply will be allowed to go ahead, and strangle

"If we were directed to close down, as racing was, we at least would have a chance to organize ourselves for a return to action when the war is over. But if we are to be allowed to start and then are crippled by restrictions placed upon us as we move along, so that before the seasoh is over we will be compelled to toss in the sponge, some of our clubs will be completely sunk by the commitments they will have made and will be unable to fulfill. I am not exaggerating when I say that if that happens, it will take from three to five years after the war for some of our clubs to recover."

Landis' Attitude Unfortunate, Magnates Feel

The hope that a new commissioner might make further progress Washington than baseball's other representatives have done so far-or even Ford Frick and Will Harridge, recently designated as the game's liaison officers, may be a futile one, but most of the club owners believe it worth while to try something along that line. Undoubtedly, basebail suffered from Landis' attitude in regard to reaching some kind of working agreement with the Government. The judge was right, of course, in firmly believing that baseball should ask for no special privileges, but he went wrong when, seeking to avoid any semblance of asking for such privileges, he refused to have anything to do with anybody in the Capital.

If nothing else had come of a direct contact between baseball and the selective service and manpower agencies, at least by this time, those in control of the game might have known more definitely just what the score is. As long as the judge was alive, however, there could be no rapproachment, since he not only refused to go to Washington himself, but angrily refused permission for any one else to go. "I wish he had let some of us go," my friend the baseball man said. "Even if we came back with a death sentence for our business, it would have been better than the uncertainty in which we are wallowing right now. This uncertainty has extended to the players, of course. I happen to know that many of them are undecided whether to play, fearing that they may be hooted when they take the field, or that, some time during the season the league will collapse leaving ther hanging in mid-air.

Flynn Hits 200-Point Mark as Terps Bow To Blue Devils

RALEIGH, N. C., Feb. 24.-As in ast year's Southern Conference

basket ball final, Duke's Blue Devils and North Carolina's Tar Heels will hook up in the championship game tonight—with the Tar Heels looking for revenge for the 44-to-27 defeat they suffered at the hands of the conference title holders last

The Dukes left no doubt among the 4,000 cage followers here last night that they are out to repeat, something they've done once before. The Tar Heels, by decisive victories in their two tournament contestsone of them over the top-seeded South Carolina Gamecocks-loomed as a dangerous obstacle in the Big Blue's path.

Duke crushed Maryland's Old Liners, 76 to 49, in the first round of tournament play.

Flynn Hits 200 Mark. Maryland's Jack Flynn hit the cords for 16 points, boosting his season total to an even 200 for 14 games, and Bob Yordy chalked up 15, but they weren't enough to halt the rampaging Blue Devils. Duke had a 40-19 advantage at the half with second-stringers in the line-up and a promising Maryland rally in the second half promptly was squelched by the regulars' return. Duke then swept into the final
